Introduction

From 8-12, June 2009, Play the Game held its sixth world communication conference on sport and society in Coventry, United Kingdom, in collaboration with the Centre for International Business of Sport (CIBS) at Coventry University. It was the second time a Play the Game conference was held outside Denmark (the first time was in 2007 in Iceland). The decision to hold the conference in Coventry was taken after a selection process that following a bidding round resulted in firm expressions of interest from prospective partners in Berlin, Gran Canaria & Coventry University.

The conference attracted 282 participants from 32 countries and six continents, for presentations and discussion on a wide variety of topics. Conferences of this nature can be experienced in many different ways, making it impossible to fully summarise the different dimensions of the conference in a report.

What plays the biggest role of the conference for the individual is not possible to measure: Play the Game as sanctuary for voices which would otherwise not be heard in international sport; Eyewitness reports of matchfixing and corruption in sports federations; Presentations and discussions with dedicated experts working at the highest level; Forming new networks across professional and geographical boundaries over a cup of coffee or a couple of beers; The opportunity to have an informal chat with former Tour de France winner Greg LeMond, UEFA communications director William Gaillard, WADA Director General David Howman or former WADA President Richard W. Pound. There are many different perspectives on the conference.

This evaluation will focus on some key elements of the conference's programme and development. Purely organisational and technical aspects are only discussed to the extent they have influenced the conference's objectives. Here you will find recommendations for future conferences.

The evaluation is based on

- An e-mail questionnaire sent to all participants immediately after the conference
- Comments from members of the Programme Committee
- Spontaneous comments from participants sent in e-mails to the Secretariat
- Discussion by Play the Game's Board at its meeting on 29 September 2009
- The Secretariat's experiences before, during and after the conference
- Searches in international media databases and media clips received from reporters

The evaluation was made by Play the Game's Secretariat on behalf of the Programme Committee.

Play the Game 2009 overview

Compared to previous years, planning for Play the Game in 2009 was hampered by long-term illness and parental leave in the already lightly staffed Secretariat in Aarhus.

Also Coventry University had difficulties because of illness, changes in staff and shift of decision-making responsibility between departments.

Some components, for example an "international teenager summit" in cooperation with StreetGames in England and an e-learning project in collaboration with the BBC World Service Trust, had to be shelved due to lack of financial and personnel resources.

Like the conference in Iceland in 2007, the programme was geared to focus on a number of key themes where individual cases and exciting individual speakers were chosen so as to illuminate the selected focus areas.

Despite the thematic rather than sensation-driven approach to the conference presentations, Play the Game 2009 attracted relatively the same number of journalists, scholars, athletes and leaders as in the past.

All things considered, the 282 participants from 32 countries on six continents are acceptable, but the conference has the potential to collect up to 400 participants without losing its unique character.

Judging by participants' reactions, the conference is still a unique learning place, sports policy forum and multidisciplinary international meeting place. Several participants in oral comments, videos and e-mail to the Secretariat again expressed that the conference was among the very best they had been involved with, and experienced Play the Game participants again pointed out that "there are always new things to take back from Play the Game conferences."

But an independent e-mail survey carried out two months after the conference, which was again conducted by the Danish Institute for Sports Studies, shows that the extraordinary enthusiasm generated among participants at past conferences were reduced in Coventry to what can be called "highly satisfactory".

The study shows a slightly decreasing commitment, as expressed in several ways: the response rate is slightly lower; there is a shift from the very positive towards the middle grades; a number of respondents commented to the effect that "Reykjavik was better."

There could be a number of reasons for this. The study reveals some dissatisfaction with the physical setting in Coventry. The Cathedral was regarded as an excessive venue with unsatisfactory acoustics, too little and unvaried food and hotel rooms were not up to standard. It probably also plays a role that many show up with very high expectations based on past experiences, and thus the element of surprise is lost.

In relation to the last point, Play the Game's mission is to ensure that the content, regardless of repetitions of themes, speakers and topics, seems fresh and innovative.

Once again, the conference generated great international interest in hosting the next Play the Game in 2011. The Secretariat has so far received informal inquiries from South Africa, Brazil, USA, Germany and Slovenia.

The next host and partner will be announced in spring 2010 after completion of a bidding round and selection process.

It is the Program Committee's main impression that Play the Game once again was successful and redeemed its purpose:

- 1) raising awareness of sport in society, both locally, nationally and internationally
- 2) to paint a comprehensive picture of sport and support the individual's right to choose and shape his or her daily sport
- 3) ensure a free, independent, open and unbiased debate on sport condition and development
- 4) to provide media professionals, researchers and political leaders both inspiration and tools to work with sport's cultural, political, social and economic aspects

5) to create networks across national and disciplinary boundaries to meet the challenges of a globalised sports and media world

Taken as a whole, the conference was executed satisfactorily, but not in all aspects with regard to the anticipated high level of quality.

In light of this experience, the Programme Committee has the following

Recommendations:

- Consideration should be given to shorten the conference by 1-2 days
- The content and the theme can be "packaged", in order to market shorter stays at the conference effectively
- More varied styles of parallel and plenary sessions with greater space for dialogue
- The professional/academic level in parallel sessions should be raised
- Better introduction of topics and speakers at the start of each session
- Increased opportunities for more systematic networking
- Utilize the longer preparation for the next conference to bring together the Programme Committee earlier than seven months before the conference
- The structure of the local host organisation must be described in the contract

Media Coverage

Play the Game has no tools for accurately registering media coverage. The summary made by the Secretariat in the months after the conference is based on correspondence from participants, internet searches and other unreliable methods. In other words, the research is not an exhaustive list and comparisons with previous conferences are unreliable.

The impact of the conference in the media seems to have been quite large, especially after former Tour de France winner Greg LeMond spoke at the conference on the second day.

The international media coverage of the conference was marked by the presence of journalists and TV crews from leading British media including The Guardian, The Times, The Independent and the BBC. In the first months after the conference, the Secretariat has found 156 articles and features in print and electronic media. The counting process has not been intensive, so the figure may prove to be significantly higher. The corresponding figure in the 2007 evaluation was 280, a figure which grew during the rest of 2007. The registered articles spread very widely, both geographically and in terms of media type. Play the Game is still lacking a continuous contact with the leading, agenda-setting media companies in the U.S. and Europe.

A key reason for the presumably lower coverage may be that the conference in Coventry was not very well covered by Danish media as compared to 2007; a number of national and regional dailies as well as Ritzau were present, while TV2 only had a single reporter and no camera crews in Coventry. In comparison, both TV2 and DR sent a number of journalists to Play the Game in 2007 in Reykjavik. Whether non-attendance was due to the finance crisis, regular savings or other priorities, is not known.

Again in 2009, Play the Game collaborated with journalism training institution UPDATE, based at the Danish School of Media and Journalism, which drew a number of regional newspapers to the conference by offering a special Play the Game-course in which participants alongside the conference programme, met for professional evaluation and inspiration and participated in specially organised events.

Traffic on the Play the Game's website www.playthegame.org has long been more or less the same level with 11,000-15,000 unique visitors per month in the months leading up to the conference. In June 2009, conference months, this figure rose to nearly 36,500 unique visitors, while the number of unique visitors after the conference has been around 12,000-16,000 per month.

Also, the conference streaming offer generated great interest. The number of live spectators was very modest, but following video on demand was a different story. Greg LeMond's speech was downloaded over 21,000 times in June alone; a huge leap to the next-most downloaded presentation, Friday's closing speech by Andrew Jennings with 234 downloads.

Given that huge resources have already been spent to hold the conference for those that turn up in person, an extra investment of around DKK 100,000 for streaming presentations resulted in hundreds of extra interested "participants" at the conference. Interest in the videos has of course waned as the months pass, but in November there still were 150 downloads of the conference sessions.

As a new initiative in 2009, Play the Game created a profile on social media outlets Twitter & Facebook. Especially the use of Twitter proved effective in relation to the distribution of news and information. The prime example was Greg LeMond's verbal attacks on Lance Armstrong, which Armstrong himself commented upon in his Twitter feed with a link to our site. The high volume of traffic caused our site to crash.

Subsequently, we believe that it most certainly is worth feeding both Twitter and Facebook with conference-related substance, and that next time an earlier effort will surely be even more rewarding. Still, we are however dependent on who chooses to get our news in their tweets. It is important to remember to take time to care for our virtual network, for instance ensuring at least weekly updates, and remembering to check whether some of the new "followers" on Twitter might be worthwhile following themselves.

After the conference, we received some inquiries about obtaining copies of video-on-demand from parallel sessions. Since these sessions were not streamed, we could not accommodate these requests, but at future conferences, broadcasting podcasts from parallel sessions should be considered.

Recommendations:

- Greater targeting of agenda-setting international media
- More active use of social media before, during and after the conference
- PR before the conference, for instance streaming interviews with keynote speakers
- Podcasts from parallel sessions

Participation rates and composition

The number of participants at 282 from 32 countries as mentioned above is acceptable. We had, however, had greater expectations for the number of participants due to the conference's central location and proximity to London.

It is important to recognise that Play the Game's potential is significantly greater. Compared to the resources invested in the conference, a level of 250-300 participants is not satisfactory in the long run.

Again in 2009, the call for papers worked well in attracting good speakers. The number of speakers who signed up as paying participants after approval of their abstracts by the Program Committee has risen from 24 in 2005 to 53 in 2009. Generally speaking, Play the Game arouses a growing interest in the research community who wish to participate in the sports politics debate, but one must be careful that it does not become the "stock and barrel" principle, which determines acceptance of abstracts. This has been expressed in for instance the participant survey, where several delegates called for a better quality of parallel sessions.

Business-orientated delegates were represented in similar levels to the previous two conferences in 2005 and 2007. Media professionals comprise the largest group, representing roughly one third of delegates - or half when you include the journalism students. About 25 percent of delegates were researchers, 16 percent from sports organisations, while the remaining 10 percent came from public authorities, businesses and other sports stakeholders.

Nonetheless, it is unsatisfactory that the number of paying participants again declined. 107 out of 282 participants as opposed to 161 out of 245 participants in 2007. A major reason is that the Danish School of Journalism could not this year could send about 40 journalism students, who in 2007 had an own payment equal to the Play the Game's actual cost of their participation.

Other causes may be the economic crisis that has hit the media hard and Coventry University's sub-contractors failure to deliver the expected national promotional and marketing efforts.

There is still too low a proportion of women among participants and speakers, despite the attention paid to this issue both in the Programme Committee and Secretariat. Only about one quarter of the participants were women, with only 25 out of 120 speakers women! This is not tenable. The issue has been discussed after each conference, and therefore the Play the Game Board resolved for 2007 Conference to get more women in the Programme Committee for the 2009 conference. As such, the 2009 Programme Committee consisted of two women as opposed to one in 2007. This figure should be increased further in connection with the planning of future conferences, and we must consider key themes that have based on our experiences been shown to attract female presenters.

A particular problem in holding Play the Game abroad is that it is harder to raise funds for travel grants from participants from less privileged countries (Grant Holders). The difficulty is possibly a sign of the times, as in both 2000 and 2002, it was possible to finance some 50 participants' involvement, while the figure in 2005 was around 30.

In 2007 in Iceland, Play the Game succeeded only in raising funds for 17 full or partial grants, while in Coventry, thanks to contributions from the Norwegian Union of Journalists and the Danish Union of Journalists – as well as contributions from Play the Game's own budget – funds were raised to give participants five full scholarships, while 11 persons paid their own travel costs but had the conference fee and accommodation paid. Two Grant Holders were denied entry to the United Kingdom due to visa restrictions.

It is still important to Play the Game that it does not end up as a venue where only the privileged gather to discuss the impact of globalisation's impact upon sport and the media. Therefore, the possibility of national fundraising initiatives for grants should be included as a criterion when new host countries are nominated.

After the evaluation of the 2005 conference, it was recommended that large print brochures were not printed prior to Play the Game, but only small leaflets with distribution targeted at other conferences. Just as in 2007, this saved the Secretariat considerable resources in terms of production and shipping costs, and does not appear to have had an impact on attendance.

36 percent of participants indicate that they heard about Play the Game from colleagues, and 24 percent indicate sources which are completely beyond our remit. There is thus reason to continue to focus upon marketing via email, the website and professional networks, complemented by targeted basic leaflets for distribution at relevant meetings and conferences in the run-up to the Play the Game conference.

For marketing reasons and as a follow up on the conference all delegates were offered two free copies of Play the Game 2009 Magazine – an offer 1/3 of all participants received.

Recommendations:

- Play the Game and its co-host should continue to make an active effort to get more women to attend, and to recruit more sports leaders, for example by offering free places for selected groups of potential participants.
- The conference's geographic location must be carefully assessed in 2011
- It must also be considered in the evaluation of potential hosts, the opportunities to raise funds locally for travel grants
- The host organisation must put in place a plan for national marketing and publicity for the conference, which should form part of the hosting contract

Program content, speakers and debates

The conference's subtitle "Visions of Sport in Times of Crisis" worked very well as both a marketing tool and as a framework for understanding the 120 speeches and panel debates.

The main themes were as follows:

- Ethics in Governance: Will sports federations come clean?
- Between Beijing and London: Mega-events as drivers of development
- Business battles: The Power Struggle in football
- Match-fixing: A blow to the core of sports
- Terrible teens? Sport's quest for the hearts and minds of the youth
- Anti-Doping: Will the technological arms race come to an end?
- Paralympic athletes: More different than the rest?
- Sports for the Good: What is it good for?

Additionally, there was an open forum for potential speakers who wished to participate but were unable to place their presentation in one of the eight themes.

It is important to continue to launch a few themes and ensure that they are clearly communicated through well-chosen keywords.

There was a satisfactory and committed participation in all plenary sessions, with delegates eager to ask questions and participate in the debate. The plenary sessions functioned smoothly and at a high professional level. It was a shame for the intensity of the main themes of Beijing 2008, teen culture, sport and development and physically disabled athletes had to be held simultaneously in pairs. Generally, sessions were strengthened with an introduction where the main issues and speakers were presented together.

The proportion of participants who answered "very good" in relation to their satisfaction with the plenary sessions was 25%, which is 8% lower than 2007. In parallel sessions, participant satisfaction is slightly lower: only 15 percent think that the presentations were "very good" (versus 20% in 2007), while 47% answered "good" about the standard of presentation.

Among the many excellent speakers, allow us to highlight some individuals who have not previously been keynote speakers at Play the Game, but acted as focal points and/or helped to lift the political impact of the debates.

- Nikki Dryden, former Olympic swimmer, spoke at the opening of Play the Game about positive sporting values, while she accused sports leaders of not taking them seriously.
- Triple Tour de France winner, former cyclist Greg LeMond told the delegates about widespread doping in cycling and called for an overhaul of the entire drug-testing system.
- Ex-Mafia boss Michael Franzese from the U.S., reported enthusiastically in an open event on Tuesday evening on his experiences with how organized crime easily finds its way into the world of sport.
- Chris Shaw, Canadian professor and critic of the 2010 Olympics in Vancouver, recounted how his criticism of the Olympics has led to questioning by Canadian police. His report later gave rise to the conference announcement and signing of the Coventry Declaration recommending fundamental rights around the security and freedom of expression.

Although the IOC in the spring of 2009 opened the door to dialogue with the Play the Game, no representatives of the IOC's political or administrative leadership participated. Nor did the organisers of the London Olympics in 2012. It is obvious that the Olympic movement continues to have difficulty in accepting the free and independent debate form that characterises Play the Game.

The only IOC member at the podium was Richard W. Pound, who was the right person to summarise the experiences of the 10 years after the IOC reforms that he was a driving force in implementing. The former WADA chairman participated for the third time, and also under a new chairman WADA maintains a commitment to Play the Game, expressed by Director General David Howman who also participated for the third time. UEFA also helped by sending Communications Director William Gaillard to a debate on the future of European football.

Play the Game must continue to work to involve and motivate the international sports federations and other prominent international actors to ensure fairness and breadth of the conference content.

As mentioned in the introduction, the conference did not succeed in launching its own or someone else's entirely new research project. This is an important goal to have in mind for future conferences.

Recommendations:

- Development of own research projects
- Continued focus on networking
- Continue work to motivate the international sports federations and other organisations

UK partners

The regional development agency Advantage West Midlands (AWM), contributed with an extraordinarily generous grant totalling GBP 75,000. The grant was decisive in the choice of Coventry as the host city.

The English key partner and co-organisers was the Centre for International Business of Sport (CIBS), Coventry University (CU). Coventry University nominated director of CIBS, Simon Chadwick, and staff at CIBS, Terri Byers & John Beech, and Lecturer in Journalism at Coventry University, John Mair, to Play the Game's Programme Committee.

Coventry representatives engaged in a constructive and fully satisfactory performance in the Programme Committee, as presenters and in the following areas:

- Ian Webster was responsible for recruitment and coordination of about 40 volunteers, mostly sports students. The efforts of the volunteers worked flawlessly before, during and after the conference. See also below
- Ian Webster also made contact with clothing sponsors SenSport in a process that, despite time pressure, functioned to everyone's satisfaction.
- John Mair and his colleague Andrew Noakes from the Department of Journalism at Coventry University had a group of about 20 journalism students to report on the conference in the form of articles, interviews, etc. These contributed to www.cutoday.wordpress.com (now: http://en.wordpress.com/tag/play-the-game-2009/) with a diverse, vibrant and independent journalistic coverage of the conference themes. Several spots came on YouTube, and CUToday had 25,000 more visitors than usual during and after the conference.

The local promotion and management agency, CVOne, took care of arrangements with hotels and booking of rooms, as well as contributing with relevant material to the conference folder and the planning of an excursion to Warwick Castle followed by dinner at a local restaurant.

The Events Department at Coventry Cathedral stood for the programme in the Cathedral for the opening of the Play the Game 2009.

The English sportswear company SenSport agreed at short notice to step in as a sponsor of the conference gift, a high-quality sports jacket and sports kit for the volunteers. Cooperation with SenSport, who were present with a booth throughout the conference, took place in a positive atmosphere and with a good outcome for both parties.

Coventry Cathedral was chosen after much consideration as a site for all plenary sessions, while two of the university auditoriums were the settings for parallel sessions. The Press Room and smaller meeting rooms were also provided by the university.

Despite assurances from the British partners and the Cathedral's own events department, people viewed the cathedral to be too large and far from a suitable location for a Play the Game conference. The usual sense of proximity and "intimacy" disappeared, the room was the first day - despite the summer weather outside - very cold and people had to sit with coats on, and similarly the acoustics were far from optimal. Moreover, all meals took place at one end of the cathedral, which meant that cleaning up and so on, sometimes disrupted the sessions.

The Internet connection in the cathedral functioned as intended.

The English firm Streaming Wizard was hired by Play the Game to stream footage from the main sessions on Play the Game's website. This work was performed to full satisfaction of both parties and meant that the number of unique users on the site increased significantly during and immediately after the conference.

Recommendations:

- In the future we must ensure unambiguous support from a cooperative partner's senior management, and we must demand more of the partner's internal project organisation.
- Early signing of a contract
- There must in 2011 be made a more concrete plan for how local partners are involved and the national angle on the event is reflected
- Strategies and safeguards for how the hosts will do PR for the conference and Play the Game
- Agreements on the location of future conferences after 2011 should wherever possible be concluded more than two years before the conference, so there is time to ensure action in the host country as planned, and so already during a conference, the time and date for the following conference can be launched

Other partners and donors

The Norwegian Union of Journalists and Danish Union of Journalists provided highly valued contributions to ensuring that journalists from less privileged countries could participate.

The journalism professional training school UPDATE organised two one-hour workshops on investigative sports journalism and turned up with a participating team of 10 Danish journalists.

Coventry University organised an exhibition area in the Cathedral with representatives from, inter alia, AWM, Routledge Publishers, SenSport, Coventry University, The Wenlock Society, TSE Consulting and The Coventry & Warwickshire Partnership - 2012's Game.

The Danish Institute for Sports Studies conducted the above-mentioned participant survey without charge.

Other conditions

The volunteers at the conference were as mentioned, students under the direction of lan Webster. They were part of a smaller "Volunteer Programme" which was organised by the Faculty of Business, Coventry University. The program included, inter alia, Research on Play the Game and training in service and directory-related topics. The students received diplomas and course credit, which was probably a major factor for the large number who wished to participate.

It is important to maintain interaction with sports and media students. The mood at the conference is always positively influenced by the fact that there are many young people present. It is also important to give young people the opportunity to attend free of charge, so they can get a first-hand impression of the sports politics debates and the chance to meet role models and useful resources among the international guests.

Recommendation:

Ensure that a number of sports students have the opportunity to work as volunteers

Economy

Just a month before the conference, Coventry University made Play the Game aware that conference could not be implemented on the expected financial basis. At the same time, it was clear that the number of paying participants would be approximately 100 fewer than expected.

Therefore, Coventry University and Play the Game together made a series of cuts which were primarily aimed at reducing the university's costs. The essential obligations of Coventry University, however, were observed, for example, to make conference rooms available and to cover travel and accommodation for nearly 40 invited speakers.

Play the Game took on considerable extra costs. Although the 2009 accounts are not yet finalised, everything indicates that Play the Game kept the conference budget within the year's total budget by reducing other items.

On the Road to Play the Game 2011

As it did not give Play the Game as expected a boost to move the conference from November to June, perhaps even the contrary, we will in 2011 aim at hosting the conference in the second half of the year. This means that the Secretariat for the first time will have two full working years to plan the next conference.

It is important that this extra time is fully utilised by a quick selection of the host organisation for 2011. The deadline for expressions of interest was 18th December 2009, and in the meantime we have received declarations of interest from South Africa, Germany and Slovenia.

The conference proved once again to be an essential starting point for the continuing consolidation of Play the Game as a unique meeting place and forum for democratic debate in international sport.

A warm thank you to all who have contributed to the conference.
